ZEITSCHRIFT
DES INTERDISZIPLINÄREN ZENTRUMS
FÜR GESCHLECHTERFORSCHUNG IZFG

Genderstudies
Inhaltsverzeichnis

Editorial
Für eine besondere Jubilarin  1

Schwerpunkt
Stimmen aus der Gründungszeit des IZFG  2
Notwendiges kritisches Korrektiv  6
Angetretenes Erbe: IZFG-Talk mit den neuen Co-Leiterinnen Michèle Amacker und Patricia Purtschert  8
Glosse: Jubilieren  11

Graduate School Gender Studies
Veranstaltungen Master Minor  12
Veranstaltungen Doktoratsprogramm  14
Certificate of Advanced Studies (CAS) in Gender, Justice, Globalisation  15

Aus dem IZFG
Fachtagung: Berufsorientierung, Geschlecht und Schule  16
Veranstaltung: “Wilhelm Tell in Manila”  16
Jubiläumsfeier: 15 Jahre feiern  16
Symposium: Historie als feministisches Argument  17
Public lecture: Women’s Movements in the Post-“Arab Spring” North Africa  17
Aktuelles Projekt am IZFG: “like2be” – ein elektronisches Lernspiel zur geschlechtersensiblen Berufswahl  18

Portraits
Ich studiere Gender Studies!  19
Dissertationsprojekt: Leihmutterschaft und ihre ethischen Subjekte  20

Sonstiges
25 Jahre RosaRot  21
Abteilung für die Gleichstellung von Frauen und Männern (AfG)  22
Kolumne: Feminismus – Krone – Antifeminismus  22
Rätsel: Feierlaune  23

Rezension
“Queer Lovers and Hateful Others: Regenerating Violent Times and Places”  24

Publikationen
InterdepenDenken!  25
Colonial Switzerland  25

---

Impressum
HERAUSGEBERIN Interdisziplinäres Zentrum für Geschlechterforschung der Universität Bern IZFG
Vereinsweg 23, 3012 Bern, www.izfg.unibe.ch
REDAKTION Fabienne Amlinger, Claudia Amsler, Monika Hofmann, Janine Lüthi
FOTOS Monika Hofmann
LAYOUT Claudia Amsler, Janine Lüthi
GESTALTUNG grafikwerkstatt upart, blau, Bern
DRUCK Vetter Druck AG, Thun
AUFLAGE 1400 Exemplare PAPER PlanoJet, FSC-zertifiziert
ISSN-NR. 1663-7879
In “Queer Lovers and Hateful Others: Regenerating Violent Times and Places”, Jin Haritaworn takes the reader on a manifold journey through the Berlin inner-city districts of Kreuzberg and Neukölln, tracing the “drama of queer lovers and hateful Others”. This drama takes place in an environment in which queers of colour strive to oppose racism and gentrification in order to sustain themselves and to build a community that is not predicated on social death. Queerness appears to be more visible today than it has been in the past and queer subjects have become “a lovely sight”. However, processes of “queer regeneration” were not without costs. Haritaworn outlines that same-sex intimacies have become well-established images in so-called Western societies, and further argues that politicians and the media have misused this acceptance in order to promote their islamophobic agendas, constructing “the homophobic migrant” as the “new folk devil”, who is rendered as “hateful, homophobic and disposable”.

In the first chapter (“Setting The Scene”), Haritaworn treats queers of colour as “geographic subjects” in order to outline and discuss historical processes of gentrification in Kreuzberg and Neukölln and the “gaybourhoud” of Berlin-Schöneberg. While these quarters have become vibrant places of queer regeneration, the arrival of people with class and race privileges, freshly decriminalised and depathologised, leads to a displacement of those who have been there for longer, mainly people of colour from low-income backgrounds.

The second chapter (“Love”) explores the changing public visual field of Berlin’s inner-city districts, where positive images of queer intimacies – formerly hidden, criminalised and pathologised – are growing. These images teach “the migrants” that “love deserves respect” and accompany a media discourse of a study that “scientifically proves that youth of Turkish origin hold the most homophobic attitudes”. Furthermore, Haritaworn argues that these intimacies are homonormative as they reinscribe the values of a heteronormative neoliberal consumer culture.

Chapter three (“Hate”) examines what Haritaworn calls “the hate/crime paradigm”, a process of sticking criminality and pathology on bodies and populations that are already perceived as hateful. In the German context of war on terror and crime, discourses on “Hasskriminalität” (hate crime), “Hassgewalt” (hate violence) and the “Intensivtäter” (intensive offender) have been closely linked to Muslims, marking them as violent, irrational, criminal, patriarchal and homophobic. Moreover, Haritaworn argues towards an abolitionist imagination of “a world without prisons”, challenging punitive institutions, like prisons, psychiatric hospitals and other biomedical institutions.

The fourth chapter (“Queer Nostalgia”) discusses the Memorial to the Homosexuals Persecuted under National Socialism, which was inaugurated in the Tiergarten park in Berlin Mitte in 2008. It highlights the temporal dimension of the narrative of “Queer Lovers and Hateful Others”. Haritaworn argues that the “Homo Memorial” is not merely a remembrance of grief or a traumatic past, but a contemporary politicising of the murderous past, as people of colour become guilty because they are unable to exhibit inherited guilt: “If you have not overcome the racial past you cannot be part of the modern post-racist discourse”.

“Queer Lovers and Hateful Others” is a challenging book. Its analytical depth and complexity requires the reader’s patience and previous knowledge of the works of Sara Ahmed, Judith Butler, Michel Foucault or Edward Said, to name but a few. At the same time, its ethnographic writing style makes it a thrilling read as Haritaworn draws on work based on over ten years of research, including interviews and kitchen table conversations with queer people of colour, as well as a rich archive of activism, arts, media, policy and more. While Jin Haritaworn takes us through the jungle of Berlin at an accelerated tempo, we meet queer lovers, drag kings, criminalised youth and other ‘Others’. As they pass by, significant questions remain: How do we think about identity? How should we participate in political processes? And what would it mean to truly decolonise gender and sexuality?

*Sebastian Funke, B.A., studiert im Master Sozialanthropologie und Gender Studies an der Universität Bern. Er ist Hilfsassistent am IZFG.